9:15 am CONFRONTING TERRORISM:
LESSONS LEARNED SINCE 9/11
Bruce Hoffman, Georgetown University

The global war on terrorism precipitated by the 9/11 attacks has been praised and criticized over the past 7 years. There are competing explanations as to why radical terrorism has flourished in recent years. One school emphasizes the role of Islam in the Middle East in promoting radical ideologies. An alternate view focuses on more social and political explanations for contemporary terrorist groups, not all of them Muslim. Those who stress the successes of the Bush Administration's war on terror point to the fact that there have been no major terrorist incidents against the continental United States since 9/11 and that al-Qaeda has been routed in Iraq. Other successes can be identified in Southeast Asia and in much better cooperation and coordination among western intelligence and law enforcement agencies to identify and contain terrorist networks. Critics point to the terrorist attacks in Europe and the ongoing use of terror in the Middle East, including Iraq, but especially in Afghanistan, Pakistan, and India. Furthermore, some of the fundamental causes of terrorism have not been curtailed—madrassas still flourish throughout the Muslim world and poverty issues continue to provide fertile grounds for radical recruitment. Until there is more focus on education, development and political reform—including the emancipation of women in the Muslim world—the radical Islamist ethos will continue to flourish. Despite these different interpretations, there are a number of practical lessons that can be drawn from the intensive efforts of the United States to contain terrorism. These relate to tactics, strategies and technologies. In addition, there are questions whether the phrase "global war" is an appropriate term to use in the context of radical terrorism, which, although having some common themes, has very different roots and spawns different organizations that are often geographically specific and not all Islamic.

As the new Congress and the new Administration begin to address these issues, several questions must be answered:

- What are the long-term answers to the radical threat? Is political reform and economic development the key?
- Is the phrase "global war on terrorism" an appropriate one for the threat we face?
- What have been the greatest achievements in the struggle against terrorism since 9/11?

- How should the United States improve cooperation with key Muslim states which face threats (e.g., Afghanistan and Pakistan)? Does the answer lie in part in addressing domestic needs such as health care and agricultural development?
- What new military and "soft power" operations are needed to counter terrorism and potential terrorists?

9:00 am	AFGHANISTAN: THE CONTINUING CHALLENGE FOR THE U.S. Anthony Cordesman, Center for Strategic and International Studies

Until recently Afghanistan was considered the "forgotten war" while the United States focused its efforts and resources on containing the situation in Iraq and establishing stability in the Gulf region. However, Afghanistan continues to be an extremely dangerous conflict, particularly given the umbilical relationship between Pakistan and Afghanistan and the fact that many of the terrorists operating in Afghanistan do so from sanctuaries in Pakistan. Although there are many military innovations that can still be applied in Afghanistan, especially if more support is provided by NATO countries, the fundamental crises affecting both Afghanistan and Pakistan have as much to do with their socioeconomic conditions as ideological issues related to the United States and the West. For this reason, some argue that disproportionate resources have been allocated to military solutions. Instead, more resources should be allocated to development and education as counterweights to the seething discontent and anger that pervades both countries. A fundamental challenge facing the U.S. and its allies is how to allocate scarce resources to fight the Taliban and al-Qaeda in Afghanistan while at the same time improving the day-to-day lives of ordinary citizens.

- Can the Taliban in Afghanistan be defeated by military operations alone?
- What are the prospects for negotiating with elements of the Taliban? What will be their demands?
- Will the new leadership in Pakistan facilitate cooperation on fighting terrorism in Afghanistan?
- What priority must be given to socioeconomic and political reform in Afghanistan?
- What is the best way to reduce Afghan drug exports and foster a viable agricultural sector?

9:00 am ISLAM AND THE CENTRAL ASIAN "STANS":
IMPLICATIONS FOR THE U.S.
Fred Starr, Central Asia-Caucasus Institute,
Johns Hopkins University

Concern about Islamic extremism in Central Asia, specifically Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan and Uzbekistan, has prompted highly repressive responses by the governments of the region with the tacit support of both Russia and China, who also have their own problems with Islamists. Yet the thrust of American policy since the end of the Cold War has been to promote freedom, democracy and economic development in the Central Asian "stans." It is assumed that achieving these goals means cooperating with Islamists rather than repressing them and making them more likely to resort to extremism. The United States has also had a policy of promoting economic development, particularly energy infrastructure projects that are designed to bypass Russia and help the "stans" achieve more independence from Moscow. The evidence to date is that this policy has backfired, and the United States is probably in a weaker position in Central Asia than it was at any time in the early 1990s. Russia and China are reestablishing their presence in the region and infrastructure projects in the region, particularly from China, suggest that in the years ahead American influence may diminish while that of Russia, China, Iran, India and Pakistan will increase. Should the U.S. be making a greater effort to promote economic development in the region?

- How serious is the Islamic radical threat in the "stans?" How effective has the crackdown on Islamists been?
- What is the relative influence of the U.S., Russia and China in the "stans?"
- How important are Iran, Pakistan and India in the emerging dynamics of Central Asia?
- How will the burgeoning infrastructure and energy projects in the "stans" change the economic and geopolitical dynamics of the region?

9:00 am THE ARAB DEMOCRATIC MODERATES and U.S. POLICY
Lisa Anderson, Provost, American University in Cairo

There are a number of Arab intellectuals and nascent political parties in the Middle East who support the overall goal of American policy of achieving more openness and democracy in their societies. Yet they are confronted on the one hand by autocratic rulers, and at the other extreme by radical Islamists who are bitterly opposed to Western concepts of freedom, particularly those relating to women's rights and transparency. The Bush administration's efforts to nurture democracy in the region were welcomed by the moderates, but in practice U.S. policy has fallen back on the reality that so long as the war in Iraq, the crisis with Iran and the conflict in South Asia continues, the United States has no option but to work with autocratic rulers and, in turn, play down criticism of their repression of moderates. Yet there is some good news—Lebanon, Jordan and some of the Gulf states display more positive political trends. How the United States addresses this issue will remain one of the cornerstones of its foreign policy under the new administration.

- Where is there most evidence of political reform, institution building and transparency in the Arab world?
- How enthusiastic are Arab moderates to the call for democracy promotion in the Middle East?
- Would it strengthen Arab moderates if the U.S. were to put greater emphasis on improving the social and economic conditions in their countries?
- How important is a resolution of the Arab-Israeli conflict to the cause of Arab moderates?
